Continental At War

¶ Since Pearl Harbor, Continental Air Lines has been engaged in an all-out war effort, and we are genuinely proud of the role we have been designated to play and are playing in the furtherance of victory.

¶ The demands of war have taken priority on our transportation facilities in order that the materiel and personnel necessary to the prosecution of the war may reach their destinations without delay. This we have accomplished with little more than half the aircraft we operated before the outbreak of hostilities.

¶ Continental pilots and skilled mechanics are engaged in the transportation of vital cargo for the Army's Air Transport Command on a daily transcontinental basis. We take justifiable pride in the fact that we are fulfilling this mission with dispatch and that it has been our privilege to train Army pilots in the flying of cargo aircraft.

¶ The operation of the nation's largest modification center for Flying Fortresses and other heavy bombers is another of Continental's contributions to the war effort. In this Denver plant we employ more than 2,000 persons, a majority of them trained by Continental in the skills required to place the final battle dress on America's heavy bombers.

¶ The result of these activities has been an unprecedented increase in personnel, most of them new to the ways of airline operation. In addition, the ranks of our veteran employes have been thinned by the call to the armed services. Yet we are steadfastly maintaining our pre-war standards in order that we may uphold Continental's reputation for personalized service to the traveling public in developing and operating a regional transportation system serving the West.
